Dr. Ashish Jha: Public Health 'Cannot Become Partisan' Issue

From BostonGlobe.com: On the Rhode Island Report podcast, Ashish Jha, MD, MPH, discusses the persisting challenges of America's public health system, what's next for COVID-19, and the dangers of misinformation. Five years ago, the majority of America could not properly define public health, said Jha, who recently left the Biden administration as the nation's last White House COVID-19 response coordinator. After a global pandemic, he said the science-based field that is designed to protect people's health has, in some circles, "become a dirty word."

Listen Now

ONS Perspective: Although he's since returned to academia after working for the Biden-Harris administration, Ashish Jha, MD, MPH, used the gravitas he earned in his former position to remind decision-makers that politicizing public health protocols is a long-term mistake. During the COVID-19 pandemic, public health became more divisive than ever before, putting strain on the overburdened system, patient population, and healthcare providers.

As the most honest and ethical profession in the United States for more than 20 years, nurses have a unique position with their patients. Patient trust on the frontlines of care is significant, but it can quickly erode because of a polarizing political environment or misinformation. Use your role as a public health information advocate to speak truth to power and educate patients and providers about the evidence supporting today's clinical practice.

ONS Members Join Campaign Seminar on Need for Nurses to Run for Office

Nurses often cite the fact that the profession is the most trusted, according to Gallup polls—as if that is enough to validate our professional status. Although the COVID-19 pandemic raised awareness for frontline workers, only recently have we begun to understand the nurse's value in the health policy environment. Nurses have a real voice at the decision-making table, and Healing Politics' Campaign School for Nurses and Midwives is helping to make strides.
